The pleasant blossoms form an array of rich and vivid colors. They pirouette in the cruel wind, swaying to the music of the birds. They twirl rapidly, for they sense a brewing storm. The sky screams and wails. The crestfallen blooms realize that their time in the world is coming to an end faster than ever. They shrivel up, as if they were blanketing themselves off from the world.